Common Questions About B1/B2 Visas

The B-1 visa is for short business visits such as meetings, conferences, and negotiations. The B-2 visa is for tourism, leisure, visiting family or friends, and medical treatment. Neither permits employment. Many travelers receive a combined B-1/B-2 visa that covers both purposes.

Most first-time applicants attend an in-person interview at a Consulate. Some renewals may qualify for an interview waiver (drop-box). Eligibility is decided by the Consulate, not by us. We help you prepare thoroughly for whichever path applies to you.

Timelines depend on appointment availability at your chosen consulate and on any administrative processing. Wait times vary widely and change frequently. We help you prepare so your application and documents are ready as soon as an appointment opens.

Typically, a valid passport, DS-160 confirmation, visa fee receipt, appointment confirmation, a compliant photo, proof of finances, proof of ties to your home country, and documents supporting the purpose of travel. Exact requirements vary by case and consulate — we'll give you a personalized checklist.

We are a private visa assistance agency and are not affiliated with any government authority. We do not issue visas and do not guarantee approval. The final decision rests solely with the U.S. consular officer. What we do is help you prepare accurately and confidently.

Many applicants are issued a combined B-1/B-2 visa, which covers both business and tourism purposes. We help you select and document the correct purpose of travel on your application.
