Director's Note

The soft, creative whispers of possibility during pre-production design are my favorite part of the directing process. Slowly, the elements click into place, and you begin to see the show for what it is beyond the book, score, and what's been done time and again. I was struck by the concept of deception throughout the show and how the characters tactfully choose who they reveal themselves to. It's as if they're engaging in a dance; a push and pull that waltzes them closer to their goal, or at times closer to their death. It's that revealing and concealing that became our concept of the masquerade.

Throughout the show, you will see the characters making calculated decisions on who they will allow into their innermost personas. For some, it is many, for others, it is few. Their masks serve as a barrier, keeping themselves and their darkest intentions inside. But often, our darkest intentions seep through the mask, and the characters begin to unravel.

Many members of our cast have sewn incredible detail into these masks. Each pearl, bit of clay, and brush of paint is imbued with symbolism and careful depth. Allow yourself to see these characters through the eyes of their masks and let them sweep you into their world.

In the darkest places hide the most monstrous truths, and monsters aren't born without reason.

Hold onto your throats.

Mel Voorhis
