What is Water Cremation?

Aquamation – also referred to as bio cremation or water cremation – is more like natural decomposition than any other method of disposition. The Aquamation process uses gentle water flow, temperature, and alkalinity to accelerate our ecosystem's natural method of breaking down and decomposing organic matter. A process that would naturally take months or years is reduced to just 10 hours. During that time, a combination of 95% warm water and 5% alkali gently rushes over the body. Aquamation is environmentally friendly. There is no use of fire, eliminating smoke which reduces carbon pollution.

At the end of the Aquamation process, your companion's physical components have been returned to their natural elements, dispersed in water – with only the solid bone remaining, pathogen and disease free. In fact, viruses – and even chemicals such as cytotoxic drugs (e.g., chemotherapy drugs) – are broken down into basic nutrient elements, rendering them non-toxic. The mineral bone ash is returned in an urn to those who request take home remains. The water byproduct, known as effluent, is not only benign, but also beneficial. Returned to the environment, effluent is shown to improve municipal water systems. The effluent may also be used as a natural, chemical free fertilizer.

LOWER YOUR CARBON FOOTPRINT

A flame cremation emits over 500 pounds of CO₂. That's the equivalent of driving over 600 miles in a standard passenger vehicle. With water cremation there are no emissions from the equipment, unlike flame cremation, which even emits chemicals like mercury into the air.

Water cremation has 1/10th of the carbon footprint.
