Cremation & Aquamation

Cremation is a method of disposition by which flame reduces our body down to its most basic elements. All that remains at the end are bone fragments that are then processed into “ashes.” This is the most common form of final disposition chosen by Washingtonians.

Our direct cremation packages include a legally required alternative container in place of a casket. Alternative containers encase the body before cremation and can be made of materials like fiberboard or composite materials. The alternative containers we provide have a shallow fiberboard bottom and deeper cardboard top.

The Co-op Funeral Home commits to offsetting the unavoidable emissions for all cremations we arrange. See page 16 for more information on our efforts.

Aquamation, otherwise known as alkaline hydrolysis, is a more environmentally-friendly alternative to flame-based cremation. This process uses pressurized water and a small amount of alkaline chemicals to break down our body's organic matter. The bones that remain at the end are processed into a fine powder, much like cremated remains.

Our direct cremation and aquamation packages include a simple, black plastic urn to hold the remains after cremation or aquamation takes place. This gives you the opportunity to take your time to find something really special, or to opt out of choosing another container altogether. Many people who choose to scatter will do the latter.

The following plans are available. Should you wish to have additional services, please see page 8.

This does not include embalming or dressing, but these are optional items that can be added if you choose.

Terramation

Terramation, otherwise known as natural organic reduction, is a relatively new process for final disposition. The process gently transforms human remains into life-giving soil. A body is laid in with a mixture of alfalfa, straw, and sawdust, and just like any other compost is given plenty of air flow to allow the organic matter to naturally break down over the course of 60 - 90 days. At the end of the process, the next-of-kin is able to receive the nutrient-rich bags of soil. You may choose any amount of soil you would like – the end result yields one cubic yard of soil. Should you choose not to receive the entire amount of composted remains, you can donate the soil to be scattered on a piece of land in need of revitalization. This land is maintained by our partners at Return Home in Auburn, WA.

The following plans are available. Should you wish to have additional services, please see page 8.

Terramation Plans*PMA PricingStandard PricingDirect Terramation*$5,250*$6,180

Same as a direct terramation with the addition of 2 hours usage of the Return Home facility for a gathering and in-person goodbye. This viewing can accommodate up to 50-60 people with the next-of-kin being able to place personal, organic materials in the container to be gently transformed into compost along with the decedent.

Burial Plans

One of the oldest forms of final disposition, burial can have a wide variety of options and service types, including but not limited to: embalming, green burial, shrouding or casketing. At The Co-op Funeral Home, we are proud to be able to meet the needs of our clients' spiritual, ceremonial, and ethical values when it comes to the burial of their next-of-kin.

To learn more about how each burial plan can be adapted for green burial, see page 16. If your loved one was a veteran, our funeral directors are happy to help coordinate an array of veteran benefits from burial at a national cemetery to military honors for a graveside or memorial service.

Please be aware you will need to select the cemetery of your choice, which will have its own separate service charges and fees.
