Singapore's Red Light Districts: A Complex Blend of Tradition and Entertainment Despite its reputation for being a morally clean city, Singapore has a thriving red light district scene that caters to diverse tastes and preferences. Geylang is the only officially recognized red light district in the country, offering street prostitutes and rows of brothels. However, other entertainment districts like Orchard Towers, Brix Bar, Petain Road, and Desker and Roswell Road also provide a range of services, including sexy massage, ladyboys, and high-end escorts. Visitors to these areas can expect a unique experience, with prices varying from $30 to $500 depending on the establishment and service provider. The most affordable options can be found in Petain and Desker and Roswell Road, while Brix Bar tends to charge higher rates. While prostitution is technically legal in Singapore as long as it doesn't involve public solicitation or underage sex, there are still certain rules and regulations that must be followed. For instance, sex workers are required to undergo regular health checks and display a card proving they're disease-free. To ensure a safe and enjoyable experience, visitors are encouraged to wear protection during intercourse and can ask sex workers for their health cards if needed. Overall, Singapore's red light districts offer a fascinating glimpse into the city-state's complex moral landscape. You must be aware that sex workers in Singapore's red-light districts are professionals and not personal companions. When visiting these areas, remember that: Sex with minors or those under 18 is illegal, punishable by up to 20 years' imprisonment or a fine. Ignorance will not excuse involvement with a minor. Ensure the age of the prostitute you hire is checked. Pimping or living off a sex worker's earnings is illegal. Public solicitation and drug use are also prohibited. While most prostitutes are foreign nationals from China, Thailand, Malaysia, and Indonesia, licensed brothels and their customers operate within the law. In Geylang, strict protocols apply for safety reasons, including condom use and showering before and after sex. Expect: Condoms must be worn; service is mechanical but satisfying; no time limit unless charged hourly; and professional behavior prevails. Some street prostitutes may allow unprotected sex, but this is not common in licensed establishments. Service quality is generally high, with experienced prostitutes offering premium services at higher prices. Time limits vary, but most ladies aim to finish within 30-40 minutes. Don't expect overnight stays or intimate conversations; instead, enjoy a short chat and cuddle, then shower before departing. Street prostitutes specialize in quick encounters, often charging between $20-$100 per service. These transactions are divided among the ladies, pimps, and punters. In Singapore's off-the-beaten-path Geylang district, a unique tour offers an insider's perspective on the area's complex social and economic dynamics. Led by Cai Yinzhou, a lifelong resident, this three-hour walk delves into the world of Singapore's only official red-light district, where brothels are legal but many other aspects of the community remain shrouded in controversy. As visitors navigate through Geylang's narrow lanes (Lorongs), they encounter a diverse array of establishments – from sex toy shops and medical clinics to NGOs and temples – that reflect the community's struggles with gentrification, sex trafficking, and the treatment of migrant workers. Yinzhou's approach is not voyeuristic but rather an attempt to highlight the interconnectedness of these issues. Throughout the walk, discussions cover a wide range of topics, from health insurance and labor rights to local events like the Little India riots. The tour takes in popular spots such as grocery shops, beer gardens selling the city's cheapest lager (SGD$3.30 or $2.46 for a large bottle), and thieves' markets. Geylang's unique blend of brothels, religious institutions, and other businesses has earned it a reputation as an area where "salvation and sin" coexist. The tour offers a rare glimpse into the lives of those living in this Singaporean neighborhood, one that is often shunned by tourists but holds significant cultural and social value. Geylang's transformation over time has created a unique character, shaped by its free market forces and largely left untouched by locals. This has led to an influx of low-wage migrant workers from countries like India, Bangladesh, and China, who are often crammed into older shophouses and apartments for cheap rent. Many face poor living conditions, as seen in the case of 60 workers found living in a three-room flat, and struggle with issues such as inadequate healthcare and low wages. Yinzhou, a local resident and tour guide, highlights these problems through his Geylang Adventures tour, aiming to debunk stereotypes and raise awareness about the plight of migrant workers. He shares personal experiences, including working with this community and co-founding the COVID-19 Migrant Support Coalition. As a resident, he wants to show that beyond its notorious reputation, Geylang is home to complex social issues, including the treatment of sex workers in legalized brothels, which are now closed due to lockdown measures. The extended closures have led some brothels to shut permanently, forcing their workers back to their home countries. Yinzhou's tour offers a different perspective on Geylang, emphasizing the need for empathy and understanding towards these often-marginalized communities. In Geylang, outside the law's reach, NGOs struggle to provide support networks due to limited resources. However, COVID-19's impact extends beyond the sex industry; it's led to an influx of temporary residents, evident in the motorbikes parked near short-time hotels. These belong to Malaysian workers stuck on the wrong side of the border, unable to commute daily across the causeway. The area has also seen a surge in government surveillance cameras, particularly after the 2013 Little India Riot. Today, over 400 security cameras blanket the district, serving as a test bed for new technologies due to its high migrant worker population. As we explore Geylang's side streets, signs confirming the Liquor Control Zone and alcohol ban on weekends and late nights come into view. These measures are part of the government's campaign to clamp down on unruly elements and shift market forces towards gentrification. This is evident in the rise of contemporary condominiums replacing characterful shophouses. Yet, despite these changes, Geylang remains untamed. Even on quiet Wednesday nights, shady characters engage in illicit activities, adding to the area's edginess. Our tour concludes at a packed eatery doing brisk business in beer buckets. The atmosphere is chaotic and cramped but fascinating and fun, much like Geylang itself. As Yinzhou has shown, this community deserves more attention, especially when it comes to addressing its challenges.
