Independence Day festivities at the Kalkaska Senior Center

By Tina Norris Fields

Kalkaska, July 2, 2026 - In preparation for the 250th anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration of Independence,a commemoration event was held at the Kalkaska County Commission on Aging Senior Center, that was both solemn and joyous.

In solemnity and reverence, a color guard unit from the Kalkaska American Legion Post 480 presented the flag and led the gathering in the Pledge of Allegiance, then seven-year-old Hallie Golden sang the Star Spangled Banner. Three historical and patriotic videos offered inspiration. A prayer of thanks was offered before staff members began delivering luncheon plates to the crowd.

That's when the joyous portion began. Dominic Fortuna entertained the crowd whit selections reaching all the way back into the 1630s and coming forward to some of today's modern country music. Songs from Creedence Clearwater Revival, Seals & Crofts, England Dan, The Temptations, and other favorites kept the fun going. Dominic ended his show with a rollicking dance tune that got the crowd out on the floor.

There was a solid, solemn yet jubilant flavor to the entire celebration.

DEAL ME IN

Those hungry slots

22 December 2003

Dear Mark,

Today's machines seem so complicated. Lines going everywhere, coin amounts needed to insert confusing, and of course, try figuring out the payoffs. Most confusing though is multipliers and multiple paylines machines. Help! Also, is there any consistent way to win at playing these new machines? Helen G.

Slots, Helen, like burnt toast, haven't really changed that much over the years. They all work the same way; you kiss a coin a fond farewell, insert it, pull the handle, and fish through pocket or purse for more money. If, by some weird brain short circuits, you think you have any chance of winning consistently, not a chance.

The only consistent winners at slots are the casino owners. Both the slots of old and today's cybernetic one-armed bandits are machines designed by wizards not, wherefore, you should never, ever, think you can beat these gambling marvels with regularity.

As to multipliers and multiple payline machines, here's the skinny. A multiplier is a machine that has a given payout for a certain symbol, and the number of coins you play multiplies it. For example, If the machine pays five coins for three bars when you play one coin, it would pay 10 for the second coin and 15 for three coins played. What I like about this machine is that it does not penalize you for NOT playing maximum coins.

If you are the type of player who typically plays one coin at a time, this is the type of machine you should look for. However, Helen, if you tend to play the maximum amount, look for a Bonus Multiplier machine. This machine operates like the multiplier except that it offers a bonus when you play maximum coins and hit the jackpot. Three treasure chests may pay 1,000 for one coin, 2,000 for two coins and 10,000 for maximum coins. As plain as day, the bonus makes it clearly worth going for the max.

As for a Multiple Payline machines, they have more than one line of play, and each coin inserted activates a particular line. If you hit a winner on an activated line, whoopee!, but winning on a non-activated line gets you nothing.

All of the slot machines, Helen, have the information you need posted somewhere on the front. Before you sit down to play, I recommend taking a moment and studying the machine. True, some of the older machines had but three lines and some of the newer slots have lines criss-crossing in every direction, but if you just take the time to educate yourself on any machine you're tempted to play, you will become a smarter player (Now, there's an oxymoron to treasure: a smart slot player.) and this will help you pick the machine that is best for you.

Dear Mark,

While watching the World Poker Tour on the Travel Channel, they used the term "belly buster." The game was moving so fast that I did not quite get what they meant by that term. So, what is a belly buster? Chuck R.

That's nicey talk for the gut shot, Chuck,. A belly buster is a draw to an inside straight; a straight that can be made only with a card of one rank, usually somewhere in the middle. For example, you are holding a nine-eight-six and a five, and only the seven will give you a straight. Then there's the double belly buster. An example of a double belly buster would be a queen-ten-nine-eight and a six. This is technically an open-ended straight because either the jack or seven would make your hand.

Connection is a Nutrient

When I was younger, it seemed like I could eat and live however I wanted. At some point in our lives, we come to the realization that we cannot live, or live well, on poor food, no sunlight, movement or proper sleep. Well, what if healthy and supportive relationships were just as important? What if, like the food we eat, our relationships are an essential nutrient that cannot be ignored? What if, like hunger, loneliness is simply a way our soul reminds us that it needs to be fed?

As humans, we are designed for connection. As a species we develop in families, groups, neighborhoods and communities. These all provided the important nutrients we needed to grow into people who felt safe, learned to share responsibilities, create purpose and share emotional regulation. Our modern life may have created a whole bunch of new conveniences, but it has also proved to have fewer meaningful points of connection.

When we compare our friendships and in-person social connections with our physical health, it's easier to understand that we don't get strong without exercising. We don't get a garden without watering it, and we don't develop skills without practice. In the same way, we cannot expect our relationships to survive or even thrive without being intentional about our investments in them.

Our connections don't typically disappear suddenly. They fade away slowly when we stop maintaining them. Here are several simple ways to cultivate the connections that we already have or ones that we just met:

- 1. Make the phone call you have been putting off
- 2. Schedule a time for coffee, a walk or some Bible study.
- 3. Check in on people and let them know right up front that this is what you are doing.
- 4. Join something locally that is meaningful like yoga, a painting class or something that gets you around others.
- 5. If possible and safe for all parties, repair damaged relationships when possible.

That feeling of loneliness is really a message. It's not a failure. Just as hunger reminds us that it is time to eat, loneliness reminds us that it is time to connect with others. Is there a relationship in your life that could use the nutrient of attention? If we want a healthy life, we will need both nutrients from our food and nutrients from connecting with those we share our lives with. This is another way that we win at life.

Does our system of voting reflect the will of the people?

By Becky Norris

Every state in the Union has the constitutionally-guaranteed right to representation in the Federal Government. Each state is guaranteed two senators who are elected by the registered voters of the state for six-year terms. The total number of senators is two times the number of states, 13 states when the union was formed and currently 50, for a total of 100 senators. Each state is also guaranteed a number of representatives who are also elected by the registered voters of the state for two-year terms. The total number of representatives for the entire country is currently limited to 435 and the number allotted to each state is based on population determined every 10 years by census, something which may require adjustment to the number of representatives a state is allotted.

Every candidate for office is entitled to seek affiliation with any political party or with none. Members of the two main parties (Republican and Democratic) caucus within their party's membership to determine policy on issues before them and independent members of congress make their own decisions with whom to caucus.

Candidates for senator in each state are voted upon state-wide by the electors of the state and the candidate with the most votes wins. In the rare circumstance that the vote is tied, a second election is held to choose the winner.

Candidates for representative in each state may not be voted upon state-wide. Instead, candidates for representative, typically, are voted upon separately in voting districts established by the legislature of each state. It has historically been the practice of states to establish the voting districts based upon the 10-year census population data, which may change the number of representatives allotted to the state and thereby require a change in the district boundaries so that an approximately equal number of electors are living within each district. It has also at times been the case that district boundaries are established by the majority party in the state legislature in an effort to maximize the likelihood that the candidate(s) selected by the electors will be of the majority's party (gerrymandering).

Establishing voting district boundaries is a topic that has been in the news a great deal recently, something that has caused me to reflect upon systems of voting and criteria for selecting winners. If the purpose of voting is to establish what candidate will fill the role of representing the electors in whatever position is being determined, it seems that the voting system should reflect the choices of the electors as closely as possible. After all, our system of government is established as of the people, by the people, and for the people.

When there is a single seat being determined, it seems simple enough to count the votes and declare the person with the most votes the winner. There is an issue with that system, however, if the candidate with the most votes does not have a majority of the votes. In other words, the candidate with the most votes was not the choice of a majority of the electors. To remedy such a situation, a system was devised to have electors rank candidates in their personal order of preference. In this system, referred to as ranked voting, electors are called upon to vote again after eliminating the candidate with the fewest votes, and repeat this process until some candidate achieves a majority. This is generally considered to be unworkable as the burden of repeated voting causes electors to quit participating, thereby losing the very purpose, which was to accurately reflect the will of the electors. To get around the burden of repeated voting, various systems have been devised, having the electors rank candidates in order of their personal preference on the initial ballot and mathematically adjusting votes for each candidate based on criteria established in that system. In some systems, the votes for the candidate defeated at each decision-point are discarded and in some systems those votes are re-allocated to another candidate on an elector-by-electors basis as determined by the individual elector's ranking of candidates. The outcome depends upon the criteria by which vote adjustments are made, and the process of mathematically determining the winner requires the use of sophisticated computer programs and is obscure. Not everybody is happy with such systems! And, so, in many instances, determining the winner of an election is based on simple majority despite the issue of failure of that majority to possibly reflect the actual preference of the electors.

When several seats are being determined in the same election, as typically occurs when voting for representatives, a commonly-used system is to limit the vote of each elector to only the candidates running in the voting district where the elector is registered. And when the district boundaries are gerrymandered to favor one party over another, there is a built-in disincentive for voting for the elector who may favor candidates from other parties. So, the vote resulting from the within-district system is virtually unable to reflect the actual profile of the district's elector preference.

Why should the vote of the electors of a state be limited to just one portion of the state? Why should not the candidates for representative to the federal government be voted on state-wide, just as are the candidates for senate to the federal government? Other than creating a temporary advantage for the party in the majority in the state legislature, what is accomplished by dividing the state into voting districts that can be designed to favor one party over another? If there are several seats for representatives to be determined in a given election, why not let every elector vote for as many candidates as there are seats to fill? If in a given election there are, for example, seven seats to fill, the seven candidates with the seven highest vote totals would be elected and those with fewer votes not elected. Well, that seems to me to be worthy of consideration. And, it might even be a reasonable idea to consider how the members of the state legislature are voted upon, too.

LSSU's Petoskey Regional Center Announces Spring 2026 Graduates

PETOSKEY, Mich. – Three area residents have earned bachelor's degrees from Lake Superior State University (LSSU). Graduates achieved their degrees through LSSU's Petoskey Regional Center, which offers baccalaureate degree programs for students on North Central Michigan's (NCMC) campus. Graduates attended commencement May 2, on LSSU's main campus in Sault Ste. Marie.

Graduating with a Bachelor of Science in Business Administration-Management is Casey Kitley of Petoskey.

Graduating with a Bachelor of Science in General Studies with a business concentration and a public relations minor is Margaret McKinney of Cheboygan.

Graduating with a Bachelor of Science in Teacher Education with a concentration in grades PreK-3 and 3-6 is Madison Matthews of Boyne City. Matthews also earned an associate degree in general studies with an education concentration.

Kitley and Matthews graduated with Magna Cum Laude honors, earning a 3.70-3.89 cumulative grade point average (GPA) on a 4.00 scale.

Matthews said, "I received my degree and stayed debt free!"

Students completed their coursework through LSSU's Petoskey Regional Center, in partnership with North Central Michigan College, allowing them to pursue LSSU bachelor's degrees on NCMC's campus in Petoskey. The Petoskey Regional Center continues to expand access to LSSU bachelor's degrees in Northern Michigan.

About LSSU's Petoskey Regional Center

About Lake Superior State University

Lake Superior State University is a close-knit university in Michigan's Upper Peninsula where faculty and staff know their students by name. Founded in 1946, LSSU offers a unique personal education shaped by its size, setting, and spirit of community. The University's one-rate tuition seeks to make education accessible to all students, while Laker athletics foster competitive spirit and school pride. Learn more at www.lssu.edu.
