

Customer information on California Proposition 65

In 1986, California's Proposition 65, the Safe Drinking Water and Toxic Enforcement Act, came into effect. Since then, a comprehensive list of over 900 substances has been established, similar to the SVHC list under the REACH Regulation: many substances have been included, as in the SVHC list, including lead as an alloying element and hexavalent chromium.

Since 2018, products containing such chemicals or substances have been subject to mandatory labeling requirements, which must specify the effects the substance will have under normal and foreseeable conditions of use (e.g., carcinogenic, causing birth defects, or harmful to reproduction).

To the best of our knowledge, "California Proposition 65" does not directly apply to our company. In compliance with our disclosure obligations within the supply chain under Article 33 of REACH—which are required under European law in any case—we provide all relevant information to our customers regarding products containing substances of concern, ensuring they are informed of the presence of such substances. We can neither influence nor conclusively determine the end use of our products by our customers and therefore cannot issue any further declaration of compliance.

With regard to lead as an alloying element in screws and fasteners, as well as in other comparable materials, it should be noted in general that, under foreseeable and intended conditions of use, there are typically no health risks. Furthermore, the harmful effects of lead have long been known. Our customer is responsible for the intended use of the items we supply, as well as for compliance with the labeling requirements under California Proposition 65.
