

CHALLENGING BEHAVIORS

This tips sheet aims to provide caregivers a general guide on how to handle and respond to challenging behaviors.

1

Why do behaviors occur?

Behaviors are usually a response to unmet needs, such as pain, fear, confusion, frustration, fatigue, or overstimulation. When someone can't express themselves clearly, behavior becomes their way of communicating.

2

Pause before you react.

Take a breath before responding. A calm pause helps prevent escalation and gives you time to think about what the behavior might be communicating.

3

Try Simple, Supportive Strategies

Small adjustments can make a big difference

- Using a calm, steady voice
- Offering simple choices ("Would you like to sit or walk?")
- Reducing noise, clutter, or crowds
- Redirecting attention to a familiar or comforting activity

4

Focus on safety, not control

The goal is to keep everyone safe, not to "win" or force compliance. Let go of what isn't essential in the moment and prioritize de-escalation.

Keep in mind to check on basic needs: hunger, pain, toileting, rest.

5

Don't take it personally

Harsh words, anger, or resistance are not about you. They are symptoms of stress, illness, or unmet needs, not a reflection of your care, effort, or relationship.

6

Notice patterns

Pay attention to when behaviors happen. Triggers might include certain times of day, environments, activities, or transitions. Recognizing patterns helps you prevent future challenges.

7

When to ask for help

Reaching out to healthcare providers, support staff, or caregiver support groups is a sign of strength, not failure.

Ask for help when:

- Behaviors become unsafe or unmanageable
- You feel overwhelmed, burned out, or unsure what to do next
- Strategies aren't working despite consistent effort
