President's Message

Findlay: Congratulations as Dealer of the Year!

Veteran's Day Thank you to all that have served. There are several events celebrating Veteran's Day—including the largest parade west of the Mississippi in DTLV.

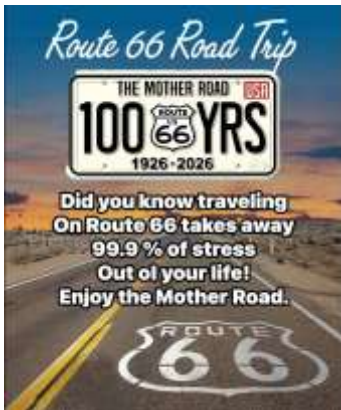

Holiday Party: Dec.10 at Grape Vine (same place as last year). See flyer for all the information. RSVP and payment must be received by December 1. We have added another payment option—Zelle. Thanks to Michael for organizing. Look for an appetizer mixer in the outdoor patio (heaters provided) at 6 p.m. Dinner at 7 p.m. Also, don't forget gifts for our 4-legged friends (limit 20 pounds on an item. Carolyn and I will be sure they get to the NVSPCA.

Membership Renewal Just a reminder, LVCC membership expires the end of the year. $25 per year for local. Think about paying membership at the same time as the party. You also need to join the national. I suggest just do national at the same time.

Toy Run This is one of our big charity events for the year. I hope to see you there on Dec 20 with the Big Wheels fundraiser the week before. If you have not been to this, you have missed a lot of fun.

Route 66 Maybe the club can get down to Kingman this year and celebrate 100 years of Route 66.

Most importantly, drive your Cadillac.

Botts' dots are named after Elbert Dysart Botts, a (Caltrans) engineer credited with overseeing the research that led to the development of the markers Botts' dots (turtles in Washington and Oregon or buttons in Texas and other southern states) are round non-reflective plastic and ceramic^[1] raised pavement markers History: Caltrans engineers may have studied the concept of raised pavement markers as early as 1936. However, the department did not commence research in earnest until 1953, when the postwar economic boom resulted in an alarming increase in the number of cars and car accidents in California. Painted lines tended to become invisible during rain. The initial dots were made of glass^[6] and were attached to the road by nails or tacks, as suggested by Botts. The nails were soon abandoned: his team discovered that when the dots popped loose under stress, the nails punctured tires. A "former student of Botts named Herb Rooney developed a tough, fast-setting epoxy that could bond the raised reflectors to virtually any solid surface". Source: Wikipedia

Why Las Vegas Uses Dots Instead Of Lines To Mark Their Lanes

Source: Jalopnik BY SHANE SCHMID OCT. 4, 2025

Read More: <https://www.jalopnik.com/1981696/las-vegas-road-line-dots/>

Among the glitz and glamour of the Las Vegas and surrounding Clark County, feature something you may not have noticed — raised dots in place of traditional painted lane markers. These alternative lane identifiers, often referred to as Botts' dots, provide some advantages over painted lines, such as enhanced visibility, greater service life, and a bump that you feel physically, indicating you're drifting out of the lane. Each raised dot features a reflector positioned in such a way that vehicle headlights help make the markers more visible. This added functionality comes in handy, especially when adverse weather affects the area. Southern Nevada experiences severe thunderstorms and periods of fierce winds over 50 mph, which can blow desert sand and dust through the Las Vegas Valley, making it more challenging for drivers to see road markers.

You don't see them everywhere, and one reason for that is snow. Botts' dots are no match for a big plow blade, which could easily pluck them from the pavement. However, one concern that many drivers may have is the question of whether or not advanced automotive safety tech and autonomous software can identify these dots properly.

Can driver assistance systems and self-driving cars identify Botts' dots? zofox.com

Back in 2017, California officials were talking about removing the dots and replacing them with traditional painted lines consistent with other regions of the country. While driver assistance systems could be programmed to recognize the bumps, doing so was seen as another hurdle for the emerging technology. In fact, according to Texas A&M University's Paul Carlson, who spoke to the Sacramento Bee some years ago, "All (highway departments) are asking, 'What do we need to do with our infrastructure to accommodate those technologies?'" Despite developers' efforts to put additional resources into detecting these Botts' dots, initially, it didn't work very well.

Fast forward to today, and the dots remain in parts of Nevada and California, and driver assistance systems have learned to identify these bumps in place of painted lines. For instance, Honda's Lane Keeping Assist System (LKAS) uses a camera affixed to the windshield (among other components) to spot Bott's dots and other markers when traveling between 45 and 90 mph. In 2025, Zoox officially launched in Sin City. When speaking to the Las Vegas Sun, the company noted that the area is, "full of complex driving scenarios, including more than eight lanes with multiple turning lanes, high speeds, heavy pedestrian traffic, and large-scale intersections," explaining why it takes an army of engineers to make self-driving cars actually self-drive. So far, the system is having little trouble navigating Botts' dots in place of painted lines for navigation.

The Evolution of Drivers Education: From DIY to Digital

Source: VIA AAA by Dan Miller Sept 25, 2025

Back in 1931, an industrial engineer named Amos Neyhart was visiting his mother in Milton, Pennsylvania for Thanksgiving when an intoxicated driver hit his car parked out front. As he later told the story, that was when he realized that U.S. drivers needed better training.

Returning to Penn State, he began teaching high school students in the area how to drive. He used his own car for the hands-on training—a 1929 Graham-Paige sedan that he had equipped with a dual-control system he designed, which allowed him to take over the driving in case the student erred. In 1936, he began working on driver education programs with AAA.

Over the following years, he developed a system that combined classroom instruction with hands-on practice that would be familiar to almost anyone who's learned to drive since then. But, as you might expect, given all the changes both to vehicles and the practice of driving since then, the substance of that training has evolved significantly.

In the first decades of the 20th century, before Neyhart, driver training was mostly DIY. You would recruit a family member, friend, or local car dealer to show you how to control this new contraption.

That informal training focused largely on the practicalities of just making the thing go: On a Model T, that meant knowing things like how to safely crank the engine. (One early manual cautioned, "Don't crank downward against the compression—for then an early explosion may drive the handle vigorously backward.")

But, as Neyhart realized on that Thanksgiving in 1931, drivers needed to know more than just how to make their cars start, turn, and stop. They also needed to know how to share the road safely with other drivers and vehicles (parked or otherwise).

Now The template that Neyhart established—the combination of classroom education and hands-on training—is still the basis for driver education we follow today. But the tools used for both of those components have evolved dramatically. Classroom simulators—desktop setups with steering wheels and pedals for braking and acceleration paired with screens with road scenes—were first introduced in the 1950s. As William Van Tassel, manager of driver training programs for AAA nationally, puts it, those early simulators were "pretty basic." While they could show students things they might encounter on the road, they weren't interactive: The actions of students had no impact on the scene on the screen.

Today, Van Tassel says, we have "far better simulators that respond instantly to your inputs as a driver." They offer a more realistic, engaging training experience, allowing students to practice driving scenarios that would be impossible to replicate safely in a car. Virtual reality (VR) is emerging as another tool in driver education, particularly because it can create immersive and engaging learning environments. AAA has conducted pilot programs using VR in classrooms, and Van Tassel says students loved it, finding it "much more engaging than the average classroom would be."

Online programs have become a key adjunct to classroom instruction. These can range from self-paced modules to live virtual classrooms with instructors. While formal studies on their effectiveness are ongoing, early research indicates that online options can be just about as successful as in-person instruction. The ability to review material at the student's preferred pace is key. "If you're in the classroom, you're moving at whatever pace the classroom is," Van Tassel says. "And once it's covered, you're not going back." Advanced driver assistance systems (ADAS) are also changing driver training. As ADAS features like lane-keeping assistance and blind-spot warnings become standard, instructors must integrate them into behind-the-wheel training. At the same time, students must learn how to drive without relying on them, because the ADAS in a training vehicle may not be available in the cars that they will drive later. "You still have to use your mirrors," Van Tassel says.
