The Wheel To fully appreciate the history of tires, you have to first look at the evolution of the wheel itself. Mans greatest invention, the wheel was first recorded back to 3500BC in the Neolithic era, just before the bronze age. Beginning with agriculture, wheels were soon used in everything from chariots to toys and are a symbol of human technological advancement. Imagine life before wheels?

The First Tires One of the major issues of wheels was and is, wear and tear. While the constant rotation around a central axle was excellent for carrying heavy things or moving quickly, it meant that the wheel would slowly wear away over time. They wouldn't wear away evenly either. What was needed was an expendable layer that would absorb damage, wear away and then be easily replaced at a much more affordable cost than a brand new wheel. Despite the need that they filled, tires are a relatively recent invention. The earliest types of tire were leather bands wrapped around a wooden wheel. The leather was quickly replaced with metal bands which lasted a lot longer. Next steel bands were heated by a Wheelwright who would heat the tire, place it over the wheel and then quench it. This would make the metal contract and fit tightly around the wheel. If you're thinking metal tires sound uncomfortable and unreliable, you're right. One kink and the whole tire would have to taken off.

Vulcanization That is until vulcanization came about. Discovered by Charles Goodyear, vulcanization is basically when rubber is heated with sulfur. This process turns rubber from a sticky soft material, into something firm pliable material making rubber perfect for tires. They were strong, could take reasonable amounts of damage and had good shock absorption. However, they were heavy and still gave an uncomfortable ride.

Solid Rubber Tires Soon after the discovery of vulcanization, tires were made out of solid rubber. These tires were strong, absorbed shocks and resisted cuts and abrasions. Although they were a vast improvement, these tires were very heavy and did not provide a smooth ride. Today there are still types of tires made of solid rubber.

Pneumatic Tires In 1847, Robert W. Thompson, a Scottish Engineer, created and patented the first, air-filled tire. Alas, it didn't get put into production and the idea stalled. But in 1888 in Belfast, Ireland. Scottish born, John Boyd Dunlop created the first successful pneumatic tire. The product first used on bicycles proved so successful that a year after it was introduced, it won bicycle races in Ireland and England.

Bias Plies and Radial Tires By the 1920s, synthetic rubbers were had been developed for tires and for the few decades, 'Bias Ply' tires were what everyone used. These tires were made up of two separate parts: An inflated inner tube & The outside tire or casing. The inner tube was pressurized and was protected by the outer casing. The outer casing was made of layers called plies. After WW2, Michelin developed radial tires and it was a huge step in tire development. Radial tires were slow to catch on in the US. Only in the early 1970s did radial tires start becoming the dominant technology. Radial tires have since become the norm both here in the US and around the world. And billions of tires are being made every year.

Retreads/Remolding Retreads have been around almost as long as modern tires themselves. Retreads were introduced when bias-ply tires were the norm. They started as a cost-effective method of reusing good quality tire casings. The development of retreads can be attributed to Marion Oliver in 1912. Modern retreads can last just as long as new tires and are just as safe.

The Future Tires are constantly evolving and developing. Rising oil prices and environmental concerns mean that tire manufacturers are constantly looking at ways to manufacture tires in more efficient ways. New technologies such as Airless tires are being trialed on commercial vehicles. Cars themselves are changing, with electric drivetrains starting to grow and autonomous cars being developed, the needs of tires will also change as well. In the meantime, environmental concerns are a top issue for tire manufactures generating 242 million scrap tires each year.
