S. Maria Maggiore, Roma, Abraham at Mamre, mosaic (432-440).

Jesus at the House of Martha and Mary, [Jacopo Robusti] Tintoretto (1518-94)

What do these two stories have in common? Why would the Church juxtapose them this weekend? The two images have very different narrative styles. In the first (one of the earliest depictions of this scene), Abraham is depicted three times: meeting the three men at the entrance to his tent; instructing Sarah to make bread; and while serving the men at table, he receives the message about Isaac. In all three, Abraham is ready to serve them, but he is also ready to hear what they have to say about the coming birth of his son, Isaac. (The mandorla of light around the central figure above and the gold background of all three below speaks to the divine nature of the event, and the shifting between one and three.) In the Tintoretto, Jesus seems to be one of many guests, as the house is abuzz with activity, but the image focuses on the three in a dynamic triangle of movement: Jesus teaching, Mary seated below him, open and listening, and Martha accusing Mary of not helping. Even though Martha is inserting herself into the conversation, Mary and Jesus do not break eye contact. It is Martha, who, in her sense of responsibility, turns her shoulder to the Lord, cutting herself off from what he has to say. Service seems to be what the two images bring to the forefront, with a reminder that whatever we are doing for someone else, we need to make sure that it does not keep us from hearing what the Lord has to say to us in that moment. Service is an important part of our Baptismal call, but if it replaces our ability to hear him proclaim his love to us, we cannot serve from that same love.
