Restoration of disc height reduces chronic low back pain

AUTHORS:

C. Apfel[1], S. Cakmakkaya[1], W. Martin[2], F. Florio[3], J. Pergolizzi[4], C. Richmond[5,*]

1. University of California, San Francisco, United States
2. Upper Valley Interventional Radiology, United States
3. Axiom Worldwide, LLC, United States
4. Johns Hopkins University, United States
5. NEMA Research, Inc., United States

CONCLUSIONS:

A significant reduction in chronic LBP after non-invasive spinal decompression correlated with an increase in disc height. A randomized controlled trial is needed to prove that restoration in disc height is the mechanism through which non-invasive spinal decompression leads to these impressive reductions in low back pain.

ORIGINAL PUBLISHED IN:

Abstracts / Journal of Science and Medicine in Sport 12S (2009) S1-S-83

The Journal of Science & Medicine in Sport is a Peer Reviewed Publication