A Call to Help: The Runaway Bride and Groom (Part 1)

By: Lesley Jean Andoy (SULADS Canada Executive Secretary)

Their Courageous Choice

10 young girls and 2 grooms from different SULADS Mission Schools made a decision that many adults might find difficult to imagine. They left their villages, leaving behind the familiarity of home, friends, and family, all because they had a dream: they wanted to finish their education and were not yet ready for marriage.

This choice required tremendous courage. In a world where young girls and boys are often pressured to marry early, these girls young girls and boys chose a different path—one of learning, growth, and hope.

A compassionate missionary couple opened their hearts and their home to these young girls and boys, providing not just shelter, but a safe and nurturing environment where these girls and boys can study, grow, and feel loved. Every day, the couple guides them, encourages them, and attends to their needs with patience and dedication.

Yet, despite their unwavering commitment, the couple faces a significant challenge: they receive only a modest monthly allowance, which is far from enough to cover the daily needs of these boys and girls—from meals and clothing to school supplies and personal essentials. Every day is a delicate balancing act, as they strive to provide care and stability while stretching their limited resources.

This is where the kindness and generosity of others can make a real, life-changing difference. With support from caring individuals, these boys and girls can continue their education in a safe, loving environment, and the missionary couple can sustain the care they so selflessly provide.

A Personal Reflection

Being with these girls (some of them are in SULADS High School that why they are not in the picture) and hearing their stories has been one of the most moving experiences of my life. I was inspired not only by their courage but also by the way the missionaries shape their spiritual lives.

One moment that touched me deeply was when their guardian asked one of the girls to pray before our trip, and another offered a prayer of thanksgiving after the trip. Their prayers were pure, heartfelt, and full of gratitude.

And when they were asked to sing, their golden voices filled the room, leaving everyone in awe. It was a glimpse into their hidden talents, their potential, and their bright future.

These are not just stories of children in need—they are stories of young lives being nurtured, guided, and transformed. I truly believe that, as these girls and boys continue to receive care and guidance, they will grow strong in character and faith, and one day they may even become instruments of inspiration for others.

Perhaps you could be the hand God uses to help shape their journey, support their growth, and guide them toward success and salvation.
