MEET THE RECIPIENTS

The Musahar community in Sonapur, Udayapur District has suffered for many years without clean and reliable drinking water. Around 90 people live in this poor settlement and depended on unsafe, shallow wells or private wells owned by other households. Access was often denied, creating daily hardship for families without their own water source. The Musahar are one of the most marginalized Dalit groups in Nepal, and most adults survive on unstable daily wage labor. This new well directly benefits about 25–30 people from five households, with nearby families also using it at times. A trusted local resident has been appointed as caretaker.

Before the well was installed, families walked 400–500 meters each day for water, waited in long lines, and sometimes faced disputes or refusal from private well owners. Women and children spent hours collecting water, losing time for school and household duties. Men often lost work hours, and many families experienced frequent illnesses such as stomach infections, forcing them to seek medical care they could not afford.

WELL REPORT

Now, clean drinking water is available within minutes of the settlement. Families will save time and energy, health conditions are expected to improve, and conflicts over water access will decrease. Children will attend school more regularly, and the community will become cleaner, safer, and more peaceful.

One woman shared that she used to walk nearly 500 meters each morning and often waited over an hour, sometimes being scolded or refused water. Now she can collect water quickly and with dignity, giving her more time to care for her children and support their studies. Her family is healthier, and she says she finally feels relief, dignity, and hope.

The well has also opened the door for the gospel in the community. As people gather water, they meet local believers and hear messages of hope. While no one has fully accepted the faith yet, several people now attend church occasionally and ask questions, laying a foundation for future spiritual growth.

In conclusion, the new well has transformed life in Sonapur by providing clean water, reducing hardship and sickness, strengthening peace, and restoring dignity to a community that has long been marginalized.
