Philosophy Statement

My values are rooted in my elders, not just in their name but in their character. Growing up in a nurturing environment, I learned that a home is more than a place; it is a foundation of security and support. As I look toward the future, I aspire to cultivate that same sense of belonging for my own family, honoring the path my parents paved while carving out a legacy of my own.

I believe that a life well-lived is measured by the depth of its memories. My most cherished moments have been forged alongside those I love, spanning quiet nights at home to the chaos of international travel. I think fondly of the moments my family kicks back and recites some of the weirdest travel experiences we have gotten through, whether it was losing luggage, destroying phones, or forgetting passports, we have seen it all. However, I also recognize the value of the “darker” chapters. Those challenges have been my most profound teachers, shaping my resilience and refining my perspective. To me, the beauty of life itself lies in its infinite capacity for creation; we never truly stop building the narrative of who we are.

This drive to build is what draws me toward the startup world. I envision myself as an executive in a high-growth environment because I have always been drawn to the “uphill battle.” Part of that is through the experiences I’ve seen my parents go through, one as an immigrant, another from a rural town in Michigan. I thrive in the versatility required of leadership, comfortably wearing many hats, refining the skills that fit, and diligently mastering those that do not. For me, professional success isn't about finding a comfortable place; it's about the grit required to climb.

While values provide the compass, I recognize that financial security provides the vehicle. I hide no illusions of a utopia where survival is guaranteed; rather, I accept the reality that freedom is directly linked to resources. My ambition isn't rooted in the pursuit of “wealth” for its own sake, but in the peace of mind that comes with stability: the ability to move through the world without the weight of the next bill looming overhead.

For many, the goal is to be “rich,” but I question if that is a true driver of fulfillment. To me, money is simply a tool for autonomy. The real source of my vitality is the “momentum” of the solve. I find a unique satisfaction in waking up each morning faced with a new set of problems to navigate. It is the friction of these challenges that keeps me sharp; I don't just want to exist. I want to be the person capable of maintaining the engine that drives my life forward.

Ultimately, I am guided by the belief that goals should be milestones, not finish lines. I hope to never truly “arrive,” because there is always a new horizon to pursue. In my philosophy, the opening of one door is simply an invitation to seek out the next. It is this persistent pursuit of growth, this restless search for the next horizon, that defines my focus and fuels my ambition.
