Toucan (too kăn)

Toucans are a species of tropical American forest birds known for their large and strikingly coloured bills. The term toucan is derived from tucano, a native Brazilian term for the bird.

Toucan bills can be one-third of the bird's total length. The bill is composed of extremely lightweight bone covered with keratin—the same material as human fingernails. The wings of toucans are short and rounded, and the tail is usually long; these traits, along with the large bill, make toucans ungainly fliers.

In feeding, the toucan obtains food with the saw-edged bill and must toss back its head before swallowing. Although toucans are often considered to be primarily fruit eaters, most species consume a wide variety of food. In foraging, toucans form large associations of two or more species that search for fruiting trees.

Toucans are among the noisiest of forest birds; their repertoire includes loud barks, bugling calls, and harsh croaks. Larger species perch high in the canopy and utter loud calls that are accompanied by ritualized movements of the head and bill.

Toucans do not migrate, but the mountain toucans move seasonally up and down the Andes Mountains in search of fruit. Toucans contribute to the maintenance of tropical forest diversity because they consume and disperse seeds of many plant species.
