

Fanelle attended Pratt Institute in New York City, and then went on to become an Industrial Designer, with designs featured in trade shows and design magazines.

Fanelle White was born and raised in Boston where she was exposed to many forms of art. As the daughter of an engineer, White learned to combine her artistic talents with the ideals of "form follows function." It was a natural transition to graduate from Pratt Institute with a degree in Industrial Design.

White began her art career as a model maker and draftsman in the point-of-purchase industry. Throughout the years, she shifted her career towards education and completed two Master degrees in art education and general education, eventually becoming an adjunct professor at St. John's University. She considers herself blessed to have taught fine art in a large, comprehensive high school that specialized in the arts.

As a New York City art teacher for the past 20 years, Fanelle has brought her skills and experience to young artists in high school. She has a reputation for being a creative and inspirational teacher. Many of her students have been awarded scholarships, accepted at prestigious schools based upon their portfolios, and have entered careers in the arts.

Her new home by the shore has inspired her.