Meet Max Looks Over Logic

■ By Patricia Barnes

Some dogs are known for their intelligence. Others are known for their beauty.

Max has chosen a different path entirely.

A striking black Labrador with a glossy coat, soulful eyes, and a smile that could sell just about anything, Max looks every bit the distinguished gentleman. The problem is that the moment you assume there must be a brilliant mind behind that handsome face, Max will do something that immediately challenges the theory.

And his family wouldn't have him any other way.

Blessed with an abundance of charm and perhaps a slightly more limited supply of common sense, Max moves through life with the unwavering confidence of someone who has never once questioned a decision. Whether that decision was wise is another matter entirely.

Like many Labradors, Max is friendly, affectionate, and convinced that every person he meets is a potential new best friend. He approaches life with enthusiasm, optimism, and what appears to be only the vaguest understanding of consequences. If there's a plan, Max is happy to join it. If there's no plan, he's equally happy with that.

The photo captures his greatest strength: being impossibly lovable. Sitting among the flowers with his bandana tied neatly around his neck, he looks like the star of a gardening magazine cover. His expression suggests he's posing proudly for the camera. However, it's entirely possible he was simply distracted by a butterfly, a leaf, or a thought that wandered by and then immediately wandered off again.

The truth is, intelligence is overrated when you're this good at making people smile.

Max may not always be the sharpest tennis ball in the basket, but he more than makes up for it with personality, affection, and an endless capacity for joy.

Some dogs win hearts with tricks.

Max wins them by showing up, looking adorable, and forgetting what he was doing halfway through.
