

Support Workers Move On

Your support workers are here to help you

Support workers should care about you

You might care about your support workers

You see your support worker everyday

Overtime, support workers can become like friends or family

Eventually, each of your support workers will move on

Move on means that the support worker won't be working with you any more

The support worker may be changing jobs

The support worker may be working with other people

The support worker may be going to have a baby

The support worker may be going to retire

The support worker may be going to move

Support workers move on and this is okay

It is okay to feel sad when your support worker moves on

Your support worker might feel sad too

You can celebrate your support worker moving on

Celebrating your support worker moving on shows that you were important parts of each other's lives, and will miss each other

Celebrating your support worker moving on can help you both feel better about the change

Here are some ideas of how to celebrate:

- Have a farewell party

- Have a BBQ or dinner

- Give the support worker a farewell card or small gift

- Take some photos with the support worker

You will get a new support worker

Your new support worker will be able to help you in the same ways as your old support worker

Your new support worker will care about you

Overtime, you may care about your new support worker

Overtime, your new support worker may feel like a friend or family

Remember, all support workers move on, and that is okay

You can enjoy and remember the time you spent together

You will meet new support workers and make new memories together
