7 Things I Wish I Knew About Satan Sooner

NO RULES. NO RITUALS. NO RELIGION,

WELCOME

God desires a personal relationship with you—one free from religious rules and rituals.

This guide will help you understand that not only is God real, but so is Satan. If unwise to him, he can be dangerous.

1. The Enemy Is Real- Even if No One Told You

For a long time, I thought Satan was just a symbol of evil or maybe a fictional villain in movies and stories. I didn't realize he was a real spiritual being, actively working against us every day. This misunderstanding left me vulnerable and cost me years of unnecessary pain and confusion.

When you don't know who or what you're really up against, it's easy to ignore the warning signs or dismiss troubling experiences as coincidence or your own struggles. But the truth is, there is a real enemy—one who wants to steal your joy, your peace, and your future.

The good news? Knowing Satan is real isn't meant to scare you; it's meant to prepare you. Awareness is your first line of defense. When you understand that this enemy exists, you can take steps to protect yourself and stand firm in your faith and your life.

Don't let silence or lack of teaching leave you unprepared. Recognizing the enemy is real means you're already stronger than you were before. It's the beginning of taking back control and walking confidently in your new journey.

2: Not Every Voice Is God's Voice

When I first began my journey following God, I was amazed—and honestly a little overwhelmed—to learn that God could actually speak to us directly.

What I didn't realize at the time, though, was that Satan can also speak—and he's incredibly sneaky about it. He doesn't usually come roaring in with obvious threats or scary voices like in the movies. Instead, he whispers, confuses, and twists thoughts in subtle ways that can easily be mistaken for God's voice or even your own thoughts.

This is where things get tricky, especially for new believers who are still learning to recognize God's voice. If you ever hear or sense something that doesn't feel right—something that causes fear, doubt, or confusion—trust your gut. Don't rush to accept every thought as from God. Instead, take a step back, pause, and ask God for clarity.

It's okay to question what you're hearing or feeling. Developing spiritual discernment is a process, and it takes time. You don't have to have all the answers right away. What matters is being open, cautious, and patient with yourself as you learn to tell the difference between God's guidance and the enemy's deceptive tricks.

- Remember, God's voice brings peace, hope, and encouragement, even when He's calling you to something difficult. If what you're sensing feels dark, confusing, or harmful, that's a sign to be careful.

3: Spiritual Curiosity Can Open Doors You Didn't Mean to Open

When I look back, I realize I wasn't trying to do anything wrong. I wasn't chasing darkness or seeking harm. I was just searching for God and answers. I was open, curious, and deeply hurting. I wanted answers. I wanted peace. That's the thing about spiritual deception—it rarely announces itself as evil. Instead, it often looks harmless, even helpful. Some practices feel calming. Some teachings sound inspiring. Some thoughts seem empowering or deep. But not everything that appears spiritual is safe. And not every "light" comes from God. If you're not grounded in truth, it's easy to be pulled into things that seem innocent but are actually doors to deeper darkness.

4: No One But God Can Free You

When everything in my life started falling apart, I did what most of us are taught to do: I ran to the church. I reached out to people I trusted, people who sincerely had good intentions. I went to pastors, prayer teams, friends who were more “spiritually mature.” I sat through services and listened to online sermons. And I really believed that if I just did all the right things, something would shift. That someone would be able to fix what was happening to me. But nothing changed.

It wasn't until I was completely out of strength—mentally, emotionally, spiritually—that I finally cried out to God. Not in some polished, perfect prayer. Not with all the right words. But raw, desperate, and honest. That cry of vulnerability was the turning point. It didn't fix everything overnight. But something shifted. God met me in that dark place. Not through a system. Not through a person. But directly. That's when my real freedom began.

5. Freedom Is Real-but It's a Process

I didn't wake up one day and find myself completely healed and free. I wish I could tell you that once I cried out to God, everything got better instantly—that the torment ended, the confusion vanished, and I walked away free and whole overnight. But that wasn't my story.

My freedom came slowly. It took months. In moments of breakthrough followed by moments of doubt. Some days I felt peace, other days I felt like I was starting all over again. And in the middle of all that, God was still working within me.

Even after the worst had passed, I had to rebuild—emotionally, spiritually, and physically. My mind had to be renewed. My heart had to be softened again. My trust had to grow. I had to untangle the lies I had believed for years and relearn the truth in God's presence, not through others' teachings, but by sitting with Him and listening to Him.

So if you're not "there" yet—wherever there is for you—I want to tell you something important: that's normal. If you're still wrestling, still healing, still learning to trust again... you're not behind. You're not doing it wrong. You're in process.

6. You're Not Crazy

Possession sounds extreme. I get that. When I first heard people talk about things like spiritual warfare or demonic influence, I thought it was either exaggerated or only happened in horror movies. But then it happened to me—and it wasn't fiction. It was my life. And it was terrifying.

If you're going through something that doesn't make sense, something that feels dark or heavy or scary, I want to tell you something you may need to hear: You're not crazy. You're not broken beyond repair. And you're not alone.

You might be under spiritual attack. That doesn't mean you're a bad person. It doesn't mean you're weak. It doesn't mean you've messed up too badly. It just means you need help—and more than that, you need truth.

There is an enemy who would love nothing more than to confuse you, isolate you, and make you think you're crazy. He thrives in secrecy and shame. But once you realize what's happening to you—you shine light on it—his power begins to break

7. You Can Take Back Control

Even if you opened a door, you can close it. You don't have to stay stuck. You don't have to live under shame or torment or confusion.

The enemy wants you to believe you're trapped. That your mistakes are final. That you've given him too much ground to take back. But that's a lie.

You can choose, right now, to start walking toward freedom with God.

That's where it begins. That's where light starts pushing back darkness. That's where the enemy's grip starts to break.

You don't have to stay stuck. Take that step to cry out to God and choose freedom.

Baby Steps with Christ

What you've just walked through wasn't just information—it was an invitation. Not into religion, but into relationship. These pages weren't about fixing yourself or figuring it all out. They were about waking up to truth. About realizing you have an enemy—and even more importantly, that you have a Rescuer.

Remember, it's a journey. Every step matters. Keep going—one baby step at a time.
