A summer sensation...

The Botswana winter has delivered everything it promised. Crisp mornings, extraordinary game viewing, skies of that particular dry-season clarity that makes every landscape look as though it's been freshly lit. But the season is turning, and for those who know Botswana well, what comes next is every bit as compelling as what's passing.

Spring is already here, the landscape beginning its annual transformation, the migratory birds returning and the wildlife that spent the dry months concentrated around permanent water starting to spread across a landscape that's quietly, visibly changing. By December, summer will be here, the skies theatrical and enormous, the Okavango lush and alive, the Kalahari shifting into a register that most travellers never see.

It's a version of Botswana that rewards those willing to look beyond the peak season calendar, and a very good reason to start thinking seriously about a summer safari at one or both of the Feline Fields properties. Bookings are available now, and the season fills faster than most people expect.

We're looking forward to seeing you very soon!

Inside Feline Fields Lodge...

Take a different look at Feline Fields Lodge, stepping inside to explore what makes it such a naturally comfortable and characterful place to come home to after a day in the Kalahari. The interiors draw instinctively from the landscape outside, their palette of ochres, terracottas and burnt reds mirroring the ancient sands that surround the lodge, and the result is a space that feels as though it grew here rather than was designed and installed.

Wicker cocoon chairs hang alongside Louis XV-style armchairs. A vintage-style record player sits in quiet counterpoint to the wilderness just beyond the walls. Arabic lanterns cast candlelight across communal areas where copper-toned overhead lights create the kind of warm evening glow that makes every conversation better. It's an eclectic, instinctive interior with real personality.

One hour that changes your point of view!

As yhe helicopter lifts from Feline Fields Vintage Camp, the Okavango Delta reveals itself in the way it only can from the air, the waterways threading silver through the floodplains below, the reed beds catching the light, the landscape an intricate, living map of channels and islands that no ground-level view can fully prepare you for. Then, gradually and quite dramatically, it all changes. The water retreats, the land asserts itself, and the ancient Kalahari sands open up below in tawny, vast contrast to everything you've just left behind.

A one-hour scenic helicopter transfer between Feline Fields Vintage Camp and Feline Fields Lodge is, for many guests, the moment the journey between two extraordinary properties becomes an experience in its own right, the transition between two ecosystems of such completely different character that seeing it unfold from the air feels almost like watching Botswana explain itself.

It's included as part of the Fly Me for Free package, a seven-night itinerary connecting both properties. Read more about it on the packages and specials page and then let's chat about your options!
