

Stump Cross Caverns is a limestone cave system thought to have been formed around 500,000 years ago. They were discovered in January 1860 by William and Mark Newbould, who were amongst a group of miners prospecting for lead in the Yorkshire Dales. In 1922 the caves were explored more thoroughly by Christopher Long. His discoveries included stalactites in a range of colours, suggesting that they were impregnated with iron and lead. It has been long claimed that he had also discovered an underground lake which is yet to be found.

One mile of the caves have been open to the public for many years, although the entire system is much more extensive than the show caves, extending more than 4 miles. It has not yet been fully explored and there are thought to be many more remains and fossils undiscovered.

Several fossils have been discovered in the Stump Cross system. The initial discoverers of the caves found four near-complete reindeer fossils and a smaller skeleton believed to be that of an unborn reindeer. These have since been privately stored. Christopher Long's 1922 exploration revealed more prehistoric reindeer bones, and also those of wolverines. The wolverine bones are now on display in our visitor centre. Bison remains have also been found.
