September 13th.

From the desk of Father Brian Ward, Associate Pastor

I wanted to talk about the Second Vatican Council and traditionalist groups like the Society of St. Pius X (SSPX), questions can arise regarding whether the Church changed teachings that were supposed to be unalterable.

First, we must hold fast to the dogma of Church Indefectibility. Pope Leo XIII declared that the Church is, by divine constitution, visible and perpetual. A pre-Vatican II theologian Msgr. Joseph Fenton showed, indefectibility guarantees that the Church can never become a corrupt or false version of herself. The First Vatican Council dogmatically defined that the Church's supreme teaching authority is preserved from error when definitively binding the faithful on faith and morals.

To navigate the changes made at Vatican II, theologians use "Theological Notes" to rank the authority of Church teachings. High-level notes like De Fide (defined dogma) and Proxima Fidei (proximate to faith) represent infallible truths that every Catholic must believe; they are immutable and can never change. However, lower categories—such as Sententia Communis (common teaching) or Sententia Secura (safe teaching)—are authoritative and require religious submission, but they remain inherently open to reform when pastoral circumstances change.

The developments regarding religious freedom, ecumenism, and the liturgy did not belong to unchangeable dogmatic notes. They were reformable doctrines and disciplines, meaning they could be legitimately developed by an Ecumenical Council. For example, Msgr. Fenton and Cardinal Alfredo Ottaviani argued that Pope Pius IX's Syllabus of Errors (1864) was an exercise of the ordinary magisterium carrying the note of Sententia Secura. They taught that while a "Confessional Catholic State" was the ideal thesis, the Church could practically tolerate religious freedom in pluralistic societies as a hypothesis. Because state-church policy was not an immutable dogma, Vatican II held the legitimate authority to adapt it.

Similarly, critics point to Pope Pius XI's 1928 encyclical Mortalium Animos, which strictly forbade Catholics from attending non-Catholic ecumenical assemblies. It was a necessary restriction for its time, but no theologian claimed the ban itself was an unalterable dogma. In fact, the door to modern ecumenical dialogue was cracked open long before Vatican II. Pope St. Pius X privately reviewed and authorized Bishop Bonomelli to send a letter of greeting to the 1910 Protestant World Missionary Conference, and Pope Pius XII further loosened restrictions on ecumenical contact in his 1949 instruction, Ecclesia Catholica.

Ultimately, Vatican II did not overturn dogma. Instead, the Council exercised its legitimate authority to reform alterable practices, develop reformable teachings, and adapt its pastoral approach. As faithful Catholics, we can fully embrace the teachings of the Second Vatican Council, confident that Christ continues to guide and preserve His visible Church.
