Humanity's Real "Project Hail Mary" Starts With One Idea: We Are Not Separate

As audiences flock to "Project Hail Mary," a fictional last-chance mission to save humanity, global nonprofit Humanity's Team says the real mission doesn't require a spaceship — it requires remembering we were never separate to begin with.

BOULDER, Colo., August 13, 2026 — "Project Hail Mary" has audiences imagining an extraordinary journey across the galaxy to save the human race. Humanity's Team, a global 501(c)(3) nonprofit co-founded in June 2003 by spiritual author Neale Donald Walsch and Steve Farrell, says the real mission is already here — and it starts by letting go of a single false belief: that we are separate from one another, from the Earth, and from the Divine.

"'Project Hail Mary' gives us a compelling fictional mission to save humanity," said Steve Farrell, Executive Worldwide Director and Co-Founder of Humanity's Team. "Our real-world mission asks a different question: What if the transformation begins the moment we recognize we are not separate, and start living that truth?"

Humanity's Team calls that shift conscious living — moving through the world with awareness of our interconnectedness, and letting that awareness shape how we treat ourselves, each other, and the planet. The organization points to a convergence between wisdom traditions and modern science, both increasingly describing a universe defined by interdependence and relationship, as evidence the idea's time has come.

"When we experience ourselves as separate, fear and scarcity drive our choices," Farrell said. "When we recognize we belong to something larger, compassion becomes natural and stewardship becomes personal."

Humanity's Team has set a goal of making conscious living prevalent worldwide by 2040 — a mission the organization notes has no single hero at its center. "We don't need to wait for someone to save us," Farrell said. "Every choice for compassion over judgment, or connection over division, changes humanity's trajectory. There is no lone hero. There are billions of us."

Humanity's Team is inviting individuals, leaders, and organizations worldwide to join the movement toward conscious living by 2040.

ONE PLANET. ONE HUMANITY. ONE FUTURE.
