In Scripture Today

Luke 18:1-8

Believers are called to keep faith in God's justice. Come, Lord Jesus, the church prays! By contrast with the unjust judge of the parable, the Son of Man will judge us all at the end. Luke's focus on the needy widow is held next to the depiction of Christ as the judge.

Genesis 32:22-31

Jews far more than Christians have been attracted to this picture of the faithful having to wrestle with God. The psalms are filled with just such wrestling with God. In the end, God blesses Jacob, along with all of us who are on the run. The narrative is set next to the parable of the unjust judge since both imply that believers must tangle with an inscrutable God. If your God is easy, it probably isn't God.

2 Timothy 3:14—4:5

This third selection from 2 Timothy contrasts the inspired Scripture and its correct interpretation by church leaders with self-serving heterodox teachers who attract "itching ears." This passage became central to Christian fundamentalists who argue that divine inspiration implies inerrancy. With a wide variation in what is meant by divine inspiration—variations that might be upsetting to the author of 2 Timothy—all Christian churches say that they proclaim the inspired word of God. At weekly worship, we "proclaim the message."
