In Scripture Today

Luke 16:19-31

Christians are called to have mercy on all who are in need. That this parable has been so literalized in Christian imagination indicates the power of a well-crafted narrative and people's perpetual fascination with the afterlife. Care must be taken to avoid any such literal interpretation, which would suggest that those who are embraced by God would not care about the suffering of others. Luke's position that "Moses and the prophets" point the world to Christ is a foundational principle of the ecumenical lectionary.

Amos 6:1a, 4-7

It is almost as if when recording this parable Luke was thinking of this passage from Amos when imagining the rich man at his banquet. Amos calls for the people to grieve over the sufferings of the northern kingdom, just as Luke implies that believers will attend to the sufferings of the poor.

1 Timothy 6:6-19

This excerpt from 1 Timothy is remarkably appropriate for this Sunday. In Christ believers discover the true treasury. They are to be rich in good works. The good fight of faith is described as marked by love, endurance, and gentleness, yet also pursues righteousness and generosity. Rather than loving money, Christians are to be ready to share.
