JUNE, JULY & AUGUST

Ten Words

As followers of Jesus, many of us hear the phrase “The Ten Commandments” and immediately think about rules. Restrictions. Things we shouldn’t do. But what if we’ve missed the heart behind them?

What if the Ten Commandments are actually about freedom?

That is the heartbeat behind our upcoming sermon series, Ten Words That Change Everything. Through this series, we are going to discover that God’s commands were never meant to crush joy—they were meant to protect it. They reveal how life and relationships actually work best.

When God gave the commandments in Exodus 20, He first reminded Israel that He had already rescued them from slavery. In other words, obedience was not the path to freedom. Freedom came first. The commandments were given to teach free people how to live free.

And nowhere is that freedom more important than in our relationships.

Every commandment teaches us something about loving God well and loving people well.

When we put God first, we stop asking other people to carry the weight of being our identity, security, or ultimate hope. When we stop building our lives around idols like success, money, control, or approval, our relationships become healthier because they are no longer driven by fear and pressure.

The commandment about Sabbath reminds us that exhausted people rarely love others well. God teaches us to rest so that our souls—and our relationships—can breathe again.

Commands about honor, anger, faithfulness, truthfulness, generosity, and contentment all speak directly into the struggles we face every day in marriages, families, friendships, workplaces, and churches.

Unresolved anger destroys relationships.

Dishonesty breaks trust.

Comparison steals joy.

Greed creates distance.

Faithfulness builds security.

Honor creates healing.

Contentment produces peace.

God's commands are not random religious demands. They are invitations into the kind of life we were created for.

Jesus Himself summarized the law by saying: Love God and love your neighbor. The Ten Commandments simply help us understand what that kind of love looks like in real life.

In a culture filled with anxiety, division, outrage, exhaustion, distraction, and relational brokenness, maybe these ancient words are more relevant than ever. They remind us that freedom is not simply doing whatever we want. Real freedom is becoming the kind of people who are free to love well.

And that freedom is found in Christ.

Through Jesus, we are no longer striving to earn God's approval. We are already loved, already pursued, already invited into grace. Now we learn to live differently—not because we have to earn freedom, but because we've already been given it.

May this series help all of us experience deeper joy, stronger relationships, and a renewed understanding that God's ways are not against us. They are for us.

Because God's commands don't restrict life—they reveal how life actually works.
